Boston — 617.557.5931

Camille Youngblood focuses her practice on commercial real estate transactions, with a particular emphasis on affordable housing development.

Camille represents developers, owners, investors, and project stakeholders in a range of real estate matters throughout a project's lifecycle, including acquisitions and dispositions, joint ventures, entity formation, financing-related matters, and ongoing ownership and operational issues. Her practice draws on a strong transactional foundation and experience advising clients on complex, multi-party deals requiring careful coordination among legal, financial, and business teams.

Camille regularly drafts and negotiates core transactional documents and advises clients on structuring considerations, governance matters, and risk allocation. She has substantial experience managing due diligence, coordinating with lenders, consultants, and outside professionals, and supporting clients through closing and post-closing matters. Her background enables her to navigate projects involving layered ownership structures and mission-driven development goals, including transactions supporting affordable and community-focused housing initiatives.

Camille previously practiced at leading international law firms, where she represented private equity sponsors, investors, and operating companies in sophisticated transactional matters. That experience informs her practical, solutions-oriented approach to real estate development, particularly in transactions that intersect with financing, regulatory, and operational considerations.
